As I'm sure has been made clear from my previous articles, I am currently in a period of great reflection in my life. I think the main reasons for this is that the defining characteristic of the first 20 years of my life has been disorder. The last year or so has been more uneventful, at least internally. I have a firm grasp on my roll in the military, on my ideology & worldview, and spiritual matters are no longer a cause of distress & have now turned to simple curiosity. The quite dry (and brown) dating pool in my local area has also made this the longest period I've been single since middle school. It feels odd to say this as a 22 year old, but the embrace of youth is slipping & leaving me at the edge of a cliff - the only thing left is to make choices that are now quite permanent.

That said, I still don't particularly value my own life. If anything my self-preservation instincts have grown even weaker. I think a lot of people tend to have a certain internal crisis whenever they grow up enough to realize they aren't special. Even the intelligent & men of great character or accomplished artists. At some point people come to realization that they aren't unique. Even great experiences like the death of a parent or sorrowful end of love have been experienced by virtually every man & woman in history. As harsh as a failed love may feel, it's ultimately something felt by everyone.

Most people come to terms with this well, as a natural stage of maturity. There's a few people with heavy arrested development (mainly in the Millennial generation) who can't seem to shut up about the 90's or let go off their childhood music & TV shows, but they're a minority of already generally poor character. I had this feeling when I broke up with my least favorite ex, while listening to a song that seemed to resonate extremely well with my exact situation. Lyrics, chords, everything. I gradually came to the realization that what I had just experienced wasn't special, except to me & her, and that millions of others have had virtually identical experiences. The experience of life is fairly unique, but the big ticket items that make it up are not.

Getting past the initial shock of this realization, it is truly a good thing. If I do survive long enough to have kids, I look forward to guiding them through experiences like breakups or finding a foothold in the adult world. I think the biggest benefit a good parent is they can guide you through these more basic things, leaving your spiritual & mental energy to be focused on greater things.

I think the greatest act a man can make is a leap of faith. Marching on into lands unknown. Whether it be as a warrior, lover, or an adventurer. To harness your courage & do something that only a few have experienced. These extreme acts of individuation are what breeds Heroes & the greatest men. As I stated in my second spiritual commentary, I highly value individuation & form on a Cosmic scale. I also think this among the only ways to truly Revolt Against The Modern World, as that damn Italian would say.

To get to the point of this, I recently stumbled across some prime Libtard psychosis. A few articles, from the Bush Jr. era, brought up a term - Malignant Egophrenia. Never heard of it? That's because it's completely made up based on a New Age lefty Neo-Jungian spirituality. It apparently comes from the book Columbus & Other Cannibals by the redskin Jack Forbes. For context, Forbes was a pretty major figure in the Native American sector of the Civil Rights Movement. He's actually the reason many colleges have Native American Studies departments.

Forbes actually identifies this Malignant Egophrenia as what some Native tribes called "Wetiko." Defined as a mind virus & as "...a cannibalizing force driven by insatiable greed, appetite without satisfaction, consumption as an end in itself, and war for its own sake, against other tribes, species, and nature, and even against the individual's own humanity. It is a disease of the soul, and being a disease of the soul, we all potentially have wetiko, as it pervades and "in-forms" the underlying field of consciousness. Any one of us at any moment can fall into our unconscious and unwittingly become an instrument for the evil of wetiko to act itself out through us and incarnate in our world. If we see someone who seems to be taken over by wetiko and we think they have the disease and we don't, in seeing them as separate we have fallen under the spell of the virus ourselves."

You can probably see why I referred to it as New Age nonsense. As I brought up earlier, I found this term in Bush era Liberal articles. Bush Jr., to them, was the definition of this "mind virus." Lmao.

Now, you may recognize this "Wetiko" as what's known to European religions & modern anthropology as the natural state of man. It can easily be recognized, through the Liberal pseudointellectual language, that this Wetiko is describing a Heroic Ideal. Desire, war, conquest, ambition. All the things that would inspire Alexander to wage his war, the Saxons to cross the English Channel & Julius Caesar to cross the Rubicon. A European translation of Wetiko very well may be Vril.

This whole concept also plays into the ever present myth that Natives were peaceful. The Creek may not have been as violent as the Aztecs, but they were not some hippies smoking their peace pipes in the woods. Most Native tribes were very warlike against their neighbors. They had great warriors that they honored, that called upon their ancestors to give them strength in battle. So clearly the Natives didn't take this "Wetiko" very seriously. Or, the more likely explanation, it's simply been reinterpreted poorly in the modern era & originally referred to something like serial killers & other agents of cruelty.

Based on my interactions with the Comanche peoples in the past, this would make sense as they still hold a strong reverence for their warriors - even modern veterans of Iraq or Afghanistan that came back with Silver Stars or other honorifics. I highly doubt the Indians our forefathers battled in past centuries bashed nearly as much as their modern descendants.

The idea of war being some great evil is probably the dumbest byproduct of Christianity (to an extent) & Liberalism. Our forefathers had a philosophy strikingly similar to that of the Judge from Blood Meridian (mid btw). War wasn't viewed even as a necessary evil, it was viewed as a natural disaster akin to a twister or hurricane. To exist is to struggle, & the grandest manifestation of struggle is war. The concept of a peaceful & cooperative society is entirely a spook, made up by madman who live far from nature. It is easily disproven by watching a predator due it's work on it's prey. Or watching chimps kill each other for territory.

"It makes no difference what men think of war, said the judge. War endures. As well ask men what they think of stone. War was always here. Before man was, war waited for him. The ultimate trade awaiting its ultimate practitioner. That is the way it was and will be." - Cormac McCarthy

One day, mankind as we known it will cease to exist. Either we return to the dust or evolve into a new species. Regardless, war will carry on. Stars will wage war against physics to shine. Galaxies will wage war against gravity to maintain form. The Cosmos itself will wage a war to maintain itself.

The very first action ever taken, in all of time & space, was an act of war. The Demiurge struck a blow against the Chaos to give form to the Cosmos.

Whether you interpret this action as a deliberate choice by a conscious being or pure happenstance is irrelevant. Our very reality was born through an explosion. It would be Cosmic blasphemy to not carry on this divine tradition.

"He who would live must fight. He who doesn't wish to fight in this world, where permanent struggle is the law of life, has not the right to exist." - Adolf Hitler

Blood is the oil of history. Many of the same lefties that decry the art of war show similar disdain for things like authoritarianism, apparently not understanding that the only way to free yourself from oppression is through violence. Abstract notions of morality will always be secondary to who is victorious.

To engage in warfare is to impart your will on the world in the most direct way. You want that hole? Kill the guy inside of it. You want that region? Kill the army guarding it. Our ancestors weren't some Buddhist faggots who desired nothing & lived in peace. They desired a lot, actually, & they took it by force.

If I'm fortunate enough to die in combat, I'll hopefully join Wotan in Volhol, to wage the last war the Cosmos will ever know. A war against Chaos itself.
